What then should we do? (Luke 3:10) John the Baptist may have lived in a world that was just as muddled as ours, but he was far less muddled than most of the people around him. If he were here today, he would tell us the same thing that he told the people of ancient Judea: We all need to look at how we integrate the gospel into our daily lives. Today's Gospel reading gives us a number of examples of John's teachings. Asked about the right way to live, he avoided lengthy theoretical discourses. Rather, he focused immediately on people's behavior. "Whoever has two cloaks should share with the person who has none. And whoever has food should do likewise" (Luke 3:11). He told tax collectors to stop cheating people. He told soldiers to be honest and just and to stop bullying those weaker than they were. It seems that everything John said and did could be reduced to one command: Treat one another with the same love that God has for you! Clearly, no one had a hard time trying to figure out where John stood. In fact, it was his blunt, no-nonsense approach to holiness that got him in trouble with King Herod and eventually cost him his life. When we look at the Sermon on the Mount, we find Jesus also telling us how we should live. He told us that anger, hatred, and resentment are just as serious as murder. He told us that lusting after someone is just as bad as committing adultery. He said that the "least" are those who disobey God's commands, while the "greatest" are those who keep them (Matthew 5:19). How are you living? Turn to the Lord, and let him answer the question: What then should I do? "Jesus, reduce me to love! Burn away everything in me that is opposed to this simplest of your commandments."
